(In this Volume.) 27. Zahm, J. A. Sound and Music. Chicago; McClurg 1892. THE EFFECT OF TRAINING IN PITCH DISCRIMINATION BY FRANKLIN ORION SMITH CONTENTS Method of procedure Effect of instruction Effect of practice Factors in the development of pitch discrimination The physiological limit Correlations General conclusions The present investigation forms a part of a series of researches in the Iowa laboratory,¹ upon the tonal hearing. The problem was to determine the effects of training in tonal hearing, considering age, sex, musical education, general intelligence, and kinship. The investigation consisted of a preliminary training series, a ten days practice series and the correlation of the results with those of other researches. The experiments were conducted in the University and in the public schools of Iowa City and Cedar Rapids in 1908-1912. Method of procedure The tuning forks and accessories which were employed in this research are fully described by Professor Seashore in his report for the American Psychological Association on the standardizing of pitch discrimination tests.² The experimental precautions, both subjective and objective, were observed as set forth in that report. The only change made in the apparatus consisted in using two resonators instead of one, which is a decided improvement because one resonator alone does not speak sufficiently well at the extremes where increments as large as 23 or 30 v.d. are used. The methods of procedure recommended in the above named report were followed, as 1...
