Excerpt: . >NE night, about an hour after midnight, Fabrice was at his window, contemplating through the little wicket in the shutter the stars and the extensive prospect visible from the summit of the Farnese Tower. His eyes, exploring the country in the direction of Ferrara and the lower Po, took note of a small but brilliant light, proceeding apparently from the top of a tower. That light can t be seen from the plain, said Fabrice to himself; it must be a signal intended for some distant point. All at once he noticed that the light appeared and vanished at brief and regular intervals. Some young girl holding a conversation with her lover in the next village. He counted nine flashes in succession. That is an I, he said to himself, I being the ninth letter of the alphabet. Then there was a pause, succeeded by fourteen flashes: That is an N; another pause and a single flash: That is an A; the word is Ina. Imagine his wonder and delight when, on collocating the words formed by this primitive telegraphic system, he found them to make up the sentence: Ina Pensa A Te. Gina is thinking of thee, of course! He instantly replied in the same manner, flashing his lamp at the peep-hole in the shutter: Fabrice Loves Thee! The correspondence was continued until day broke. That night was the one hundred and seventy-third of his captivity, and he was informed that this...
