Neuware - Seminar paper from the year 2007 in the subject American Studies - Culture and Applied Geography, printed single-sided, grade: 1,7, University of Mannheim, language: English, abstract: The United States educational system is divided into three levels: elementary (or primary), secondary, and higher education. This paper will deal with the development of the American higher education, and in particular, the development of American universities and colleges. The first chapter of my term paper provides an overview of American higher education, looking at both the strengths and weaknesses of the system. The U.S. higher education system is very costly for the individual student. The cost of education itself acts as a filter, excluding those who cannot afford it. Whilst parents and students can obtain financial aid itself, economics often determines whether higher education is an option after high-school or not. Such financial obstacles are problem for many students in United States. That's why I am going to show some facts and possibilities of sources of support. In the second chapter, my term paper shall look at...
